Excerpt: . . . i He and bit few, his sons, his valiant few, As fixd as fate, and to each other tract Opposd the torrent of the Gallic host, And left a lesson on the blood-staind coast; To teach how British sons, with British sires, Retain the splendour of a Nelsons fires; Each heart beat high, each soul new-nervd each hand, And firm as rocks the gallant heroes stand With splendour beamd, each warriors radiant eye, Resolvd to conquer, or to bravely die; Checkd by their prowess, in a staggring maze, The tyrants host in awful wonder gaze; And turnd their backs, till the revolving sun, Three times its circuit in the sphere had run, Altho their numbers were as three to one. Now soft compassion swelld the warriors breast, They bore their wounded to a place of rest; A certain proof, that in this awful fray, Old Albion trinnphd, Britons won the day But soft, my soul, return on lightningswing, And with spontaneous accents, pensive sing, Of Moore, great name 1 how Moore triumphant fell, Oh! teach your babes the lovely theme to tell! Your sons to chant it, with each tender tongue, Till hill and vale th responsive notes have rang, The pleasing sounds will thro each region fly, , Then leave this world, and soar unto the sky. After remaining between two and three years in this state of celibacy, I became uneasy. My wifes health remained in that precarious stale, which rendered it...
