Not illustrated. 1897 Excerpt: .none of the most approvedly scientific, but, like all else she did, were peculiar to Elizabeth Coles. When, for instance, Hiram had begged incessantly for whiskey during the first months of his helplessness, she sat down and read him Sunday-school lessons with such awful descriptions of eternal punishment as only a mind ignorant of real horror can conjure up. However much the student of mental and physical diseases might have disapproved of Elizabeth s treatment, her lectures were effective, and Hiram soon learned to ask for nothing more wicked than new cider. Finally the old man (he was only forty when this story opens, but his scant hair was gray, and his face and hands were wrinkled and sallow), finally old Hiram forgot that he ever loved liquor, and sank into a sort of dull contentment. When the weather was fine, she would dress him in his black suit and wheel him out upon the broad piazza, where he would sit and watch whatever nature or mankind chanced to offer by way of entertainment. When the days grew colder, and the wind sent the maple leaves sliding across the yard, he would sit by the window in his own room back of the parlor and wait patiently for Elizabeth to finish her work and read to him. He was not querulous. If Elizabeth was very much occupied or, as sometimes happened, was obliged to leave him alone in the house, he would study the flowers on...
