Poor little Minnie! she felt terribly lonely and helpless standing in that strange place with strange faces around her, and the knowledge that father and mother and Amy were left miles and miles behind; and she was wofully disposed to begin crying again. But she knew that the eyes of the two tall footmen were upon her, and dared not--absolutely dared not. So, mute as a mouse, she suffered her duenna to take hold of her hand and conduct her up the steps into the house . Here she found herself in a large hall---a room as it seemed to her--with mahogany chairs ranged on each side, and coats and hats hanging like gigantic leaves from the branches of a huge tree-shaped stand; while before her was a broad staircase covered with a thick carpet of complicated pattern, complicated still further by the colours cast on it by the sunbeams shining through a stained glass window on the first landing. The place was very Qsolemn to Minnie---solemn in its dim rich lighting, solemn in its carpet-muffled echoes, solemn even in the close upholsterer s-shop smell which, crossed with a faint odour of cut flowers, seemed to impregnate the whole atmosphere with respectability and decorum. Her heart was very full, but she felt the same obligation not to cry here as she was wont to feel on Sundays at church. This sense of what was due to her surroundings was increased rather...
