The truth is, our doctrine is known to be reasonable, and to stand the test of inquiry-Hence everything is done which can be to make people distrust reason, surrender it entirely, and be governed wholly by feeling. This admission ought to convince all men that the doctrine of endless suffering has no foundation in truth; that it cannot be of God, but originated with man. This conclusion will be confirmed by considering, I. That it is unreasonable to suppose God will punish a finite creature with endless misery. It is impossible to discover any resemblance to justice in such a punishment. Justice would proportion punishment to the guilt of the offender. This is the idea which all men have of justice. We do not punish the offences of a child with the severity we do the offences of a...
